A fundamental goal of the Air Force personnel system is to ensure that the manpower inventory, by Air Force specialty code and grade, matches requirements. However, there are structural obstacles that impede achieving this goal. To remove one of those obstacles, the authors propose a methodology that would marginally modify grade authorizations within skill levels to make it possible to better achieve manpower targets. This report summarizes the results of a 2004 analysis of county-level eligibility for financial and technical assistance through the USDA Forest Service Economic Recovery program and contrasts those results to the initial eligibility analysis performed in 1993. County-level eligibility was based on three criteria: (1) proximity to a National Forest or National Grassland, (2) population, and (3) economic dependency on forest resources. Holding methodology constant, there was a net loss in eligibility of 60 counties, with 413 counties remaining eligible, 237 losing eligibility, and 177 gaining eligibility. On average, dependency on wildland industries decreased regardless of wildland industry sector or eligibility status. Counties that remained eligible were initially more dependent on wildland industries than counties that lost or gained eligibility. Most of the counties gaining eligibility did so because of the change in the population criteria rather than because of changes in dependency. Counties losing eligibility were, on average, larger in population, more economically diverse, smaller in land area, and had a smaller percentage of NFS lands in 1990 than counties that maintained eligibility. They also experienced, in percentage terms, more growth in population, per capita income, and median family income over the 10-year period from 1990 to 2000. "This guide should assist social service workers in social agencies, churches, labor organizations and other agencies to advise low income families on potential eligibility for participation in the federal food stamp program in Marion County." --Introduction. California's county social service offices are the primary point of contact for those applying for Medi-Cal, CalWORKs, and CalFresh. County staff perform administrative activities for many programs, so changes in workload or funding affecting one of them are likely to affect others. This report examines how the state finances county administration of these programs and explores the potential impacts of several changes underway and on the horizon, such as budget cuts, a new methodology for determining Medi-Cal administrative payments to counties, and the transition of children from Healthy Families to Medi-Cal.
